

Behavioral & Psychiatric Health Technician

INDUSTRY FACTS

What do behavioral and psychiatric health technicians do?

Everyone has their vices. Those unhealthy (but generally harmless) habits we develop over time. But left unchecked, those innocuous behaviors can transform into devastating addictions. Peer support specialists generally have experience navigating their own dependencies and mental health issues. They are compassionate, patient, understanding, and possess excellent interpersonal skills. Here's a breakdown of their responsibilities:

- Evaluating clients' mental and physical health, addiction, or problematic behavior
- Assessing patients' readiness for treatment
- Developing, recommending, and reviewing treatment goals and plans with clients and their families
- Assisting patients in developing skills and behaviors necessary to recover from their addiction
- Working with clients to identify behaviors or situations that interfere with their recovery

Where do they work?

Behavioral and psychiatric technicians work in a variety of environments that range from mental health centers and community centers to prisons and private practices.

How much do they earn?

There's something about working in a field that is meaningful and pays well—particularly in a world where more and more professionals are looking to make a real difference in the lives of others. According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, the average psychiatric technician salary is $36,230 per year.

How's the job outlook?

As mental and physical health continue to take center stage, experts predict an 11% job growth rate over the next 10 years.
